

LoveReading4kids.co.uk
is a book website created for parents and children to make choosing books easy
and fun

Opening extract from Sara's Face

Written by Melvin Burgess

Published by Andersen Press Ltd

All Text is Copyright © of the Author and/or Illustrator

Please print off and read at your leisure.

MELVIN BURGESS

Sara's Face

ANDERSEN PRESS • LONDON

For my daughter, Pearl

This edition first published in 2017 by
Andersen Press Limited
20 Vauxhall Bridge Road
London SW1V 2SA
www.andersenpress.co.uk

2 4 6 8 10 9 7 5 3 1

First published in hardback by Andersen Press Ltd in 2006

All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system or transmitted in any form, or by any means, electronic, mechanical, photocopying, recording or otherwise, without the written permission of the publisher.

The right of Melvin Burgess to be identified as the author and illustrator of this work has been asserted by him in accordance with the Copyright, Designs and Patents Act, 1988.

Text copyright © Melvin Burgess, 2006, 2008

British Library Cataloguing in Publication Data available.

ISBN 978 1 78344 488 5

Printed and bound in Great Britain by Clays Limited,
Bungay, Suffolk, NR35 1ED

Introduction

Just about everyone knows the story of Jonathon Heat and Sara Carter. It's common currency, revealed to us through a thousand newspaper headlines, magazine articles, news bulletins, TV shows and an endless commentary on the radio. Heat's sheer celebrity is one factor that made the story of such universal interest. While he still had one, his was perhaps the most famous face on the planet. We've been hearing about him for years but the strange nature of his crimes and his terrible fate have made this particular story his most lasting legacy to us.

Sara is different. She comes down to us as a mystery, a figure without explanation. Her refusal or inability to speak has led to endless speculation about her, but the story of her hopes and dreams, and her role in the terrible way they were fulfilled, remain elusive. How much did she plan? Was she in control the whole time, or was she just the innocent victim of Heat and his surgeon, Wayland Kaye? It's the purpose of this book to try to cast some light on the girl herself.

As someone used to trying to create an impression of truth, investigating actual truth has proved to be a tricky affair. Both Heat and Sara seem to have been master dissemblers themselves, with only very shaky ideas of who they really were or what they wanted to become. Heat, of course, is in prison. Sara's fate is more open to speculation. Since her failure to come and give evidence in court, rumours have circulated widely; madness or death, or the terrible nature of her injuries, seem to be the most likely options, but, to this day, no one is really sure. I'm a novelist doing a journalist's job, and my brief has been to get at what people thought and felt, and what their motivations were, as much as simply to describe the unfolding of events. What goes on in people's hearts is a notoriously tricky thing to know. I've done my best to understand rather than speculate, but, frankly, I've been amazed at how little positive truth you come across after even the most thorough investigation. Everything that happens is filtered through opinion and memory, and of course by how much other people want you to know. No two people remember anything in exactly the same way. I've done my best to verify, everything before I came to write it. Most of all, I've done my best to be true to Sara.

I've been able to speak to almost all the people involved in the events that took place in Cheshire in 2005, except of course the two main protagonists. Even with all the contacts in my hand, Sara has proved to be incredibly elusive. She told so many different versions of what was going on to so many different people, it's as if she has done her best to extinguish her real self in favour of her own legend. Perhaps that's the nature of her tragedy. Like a religious figure or a character from myth, it's nothing she ever said or did but her story itself that forces her on our attention and inspires our imagination. In that sense, she more than achieved her ambition of making fame itself a work of art.

SARA'S FACE

There is one great asset I've been given access to, however – the video diary that Sara kept on and off over the years, including during her stay at Home Manor Farm. This may be the only chance we will ever have of hearing her speak directly to us again, so let's start off with that right away. Here she is talking about her boyfriend, Mark, a few days before she went into the hospital where she first met Jonathon Heat.

Sara — 2 April 2005

(Sara is sitting in a chair looking off to the side of the camera, as if someone else is sitting there talking to her. But hers is the only voice we hear. In fact, she's pretending to be interviewed for the TV. Occasionally she glances at the camera and examines something — she can probably see herself on a monitor. At other times, she forgets where she is and seems to be talking almost to herself. It's as if she's working out her own thoughts and feelings through this pretend interview.)

No, that's not true. I did love him, I really did. I still do. But it has to work. Love isn't the same as compatibility, I've had to learn that. It's a hard lesson. You'd think love would be enough. Mark was too different from me. It had to stop.

(She pauses as if she's being asked a question.)

Well, we seemed to get along so well, but in the end we're actually perfect opposites. He thinks, like, the sensible people are the ones who have it sorted. Like they're going to inherit the earth. (Laughs.) Like sensible is it. Anything you do that's important, it has to be sensible, that's Mark, whereas me, I want everything I do that's important to be unexpected – just about ready to bend everything sideways.

I used to scare him, I think. 'You'll get hurt,' he used to say, but maybe what he really meant was, he'd get hurt. He used to talk about it as if it had already happened. I mean – as if he could sit down and work out the future with a pencil and paper. You don't work out the future! The future works you out. To see the future you have to be able to prophesy, and it's not the sensible ones who can do that – it's the people who don't know what on earth is going on, the ones who know absolutely nothing, who can see into the future and see ghosts and that. I've done it. I may talk about it one day. He wants to make sure he has enough pants packed for the journey through life. Well, I might not even be wearing any pants at all. You think I know fuck all, but I know fuck nothing – that's me. I don't know who I am, I don't even know what I am. That's how I can see into the future. That's how sensible I am!

(She laughs, as delighted with her own words as if they had been spoken by someone else. She leans forward to the hidden monitor and fixes her hair, then leans back and sighs.)

Stick to the flesh, boy! I am the spirit.

He's the flesh all right, though. He does my head in sometimes, I want him so much. That's what I miss most. Being close. He's someone you can get very close to.

(Sara looks down and fiddles with her shirt, frowning as if she's forgotten where she is.)

We were lying on the sofa at his flat. We'd just been busy. Busy bees, we call it. I was lying there with a skirt on and just about nothing else and he had my T-shirt rolled up and he was sort of adoring my boobs. Boob adoration.

'Gorgeous. Like puppies. Like warm little puppies with hot pink noses,' he was saying, and he kept giving me goose flesh by breathing on them.

'Well, make the most of them, they won't be around much longer,' I told him.

'What do you mean, you're not going to put them away, are you?' he said. (Laughs.) He makes me laugh; I'll forgive him anything for making me laugh. I miss that about him, too. Yeah! A boy has to make me laugh!

'I've started saving up,' I told him. He knew what I meant. I was serious. I wanted to tell him because he's my boyfriend. He's involved. I mean, he ought to be my soul mate or something, but that's too much to ask from someone who's only sensible.

I knew we were going to have a row about it.

'You ought to be grateful I've got my clothes on – it's such a mess underneath. Talk about cellulite. It's revolting. This tit's practically under my arm when I lie down. What good's that on a photo shoot?'

'They use tit tape for that,' he told me.

'Tit tape! I want to look like that naturally; anyone can use tit tape. And this one's bigger than that one, they both point sideways when I stand up and anyway – mostly, they're just too small and the wrong shape. They've got to go. I need new tits. I need a whole new body, actually. I get fatter when I'm dieting. I get fat just by breathing. I can turn air into fat. It's a gift I have.'

(She giggles at her own words.)

You should have seen his face! Like I was taking away his favourite toy car or something.

'You can't do that! They're mine,' he said.

I said, 'They're just on loan, buddy, and don't you forget it.'

He says they're lovely, but he's just saying that to be nice, I think. 'How can anything be better?' he says, but plenty of things are better than them. Too many things are better, that's the problem.

Up until that point it was just fun, but then he started to get all serious on me. 'You know what they do to you when you get that done?' he said. 'They cut you here, right round the nipple. They get it out on a stalk, man! They get your nipple on a stalk while they stitch bags inside your tits – it's like torture. And then you know what? You lose feeling. They cut loads of nerves doing that and they never grow back. Sex will never be as good again.'

'I don't care,' I told him. I mean, if you want to be a work of art, you have to suffer a bit. That's all part of the package. But he pissed me off then, going on about blood and cutting and things. That's not what I wanted to hear.