

Helping your children choose books they will love

Lovereading4kids.co.uk is a book website created for parents and children to make choosing books easy and fun

opening extract from

Numbers 2: The Chaos

written by

Rachel Ward

published by

Chicken House Ltd

All Text is Copyright © of the Author and/or Illustrator please print off and read at your leisure.

From the Chicken House

Rachel Ward's new novel, NUMBERS: THE CHAOS, made even greater demands on my nerves than her first. Here's an author who can climb into your head, create truly believable characters, and give you a superb thriller with colossal consequences – all in one book!

Remember the scene with Jem's son at the end of NUMBERS? Spooky wasn't it? You knew he was special, I'm sure. Well, his future is even stranger than you can imagine . . .

Barry Cunningham
Publisher

The title 'NUMBERS: THE CHAOS' is rendered in a large, bold, black, sans-serif font, rotated 90 degrees counter-clockwise. The word 'NUMBERS' is split into 'NUM' and 'BERS' by a diagonal line. The author's name 'RACHEL WARD' is written in a smaller, black, sans-serif font, oriented vertically along the diagonal line. The words 'THE' and 'CHAOS' are positioned below 'NUMBERS', with 'THE' being smaller and 'CHAOS' being larger. Small numbers 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7 are placed at various points along the diagonal line.

For Ozzy, my soulmate

Text © Rachel Ward 2010

First published in Great Britain in 2010

The Chicken House
2 Palmer Street
Frome, Somerset BA11 1DS
United Kingdom
www.doubleluck.com

Rachel Ward has asserted her rights under the Copyright, Designs and Patents Act, 1988, to be identified as the author of this work.

All rights reserved.

No part of this publication may be reproduced or transmitted or utilized in any form or by any means, electronic, mechanical, photocopying or otherwise, without the prior permission of the publisher.

Jacket design Steve Wells
Interior design Steve Wells

Typeset by Dorchester Typesetting Group Ltd
Printed and bound in Great Britain by CPI Bookmarque, Croydon, CR0 4TD

The paper used in this Chicken House book is made from wood grown in sustainable forests.

1 3 5 7 9 10 8 6 4 2

British Library Cataloguing in Publication data available.

ISBN 978-1-906427-30-6

08201323122
82064210420
82032220720
3122
4206
20720
0420
0720
312
3122 23
04
2072
3122
6
22 07 2
3122
0420
072 0
312 2
312
0420
0720 2
312
420 6
7202 0
3122
0 42
0 72 0
0420
2072
2 1 131
082032
01323122

June 2026

Adam

The knock on the door comes early in the morning, just as it's getting light.

'Open up! Open up! We've got an Evacuation Order on these flats. Moving out in five minutes. Five minutes everybody!'

You can hear them going down the corridor, knocking on doors, repeating the same instructions over and over. I haven't been asleep, but Nan nodded off in her chair, and now she jerks awake and curses.

'Bloody hell, Adam. What time is it?' Her face looks crumpled and old, too old to go with her purple hair.

'Half-six, Nan. They've come.'

She looks at me, tired and wary.

'This is it, then,' she says. 'Better find your things.'

I look back at her and I think, I'm not going anywhere. Not with you.

We've been expecting this. We've been camped out in the flat for four days, watching the flood water rising in the street below. They'd warned everyone that the sea wall was likely to go. It was built years ago before the sea level rose, and it wasn't going to stand another storm with a spring tide to add to the swell.

We thought the water would come and then go, but it came and it stayed.

'S'pose this is what Venice looked like before it was washed away,' Nan said, gloomily. She flicked her cigarette butt out of the window and down into the water below. It bobbed slowly along the street towards where the prom had been. And she lit another fag.

The electricity was cut off that first night, then the water in the taps turned brown. People waded along the street outside shouting through loud hailers, warning us not to drink the water, saying they'd bring us food and water. They didn't. Instead we made do with what we'd got, but with no toaster and no microwave, and the milk going off in the fridge, we were starting to get hungry after twelve hours. I knew things were bad when Nan took the cellophane off her last packet of fags.

'Once these are gone we're going to have to get out of here, son,' she said.

'I'm not going,' I told her. This was my home. It was all I had left of Mum.

'We can't stay here, not like this.'

'I'm not going.' Statement of fact. 'You can bugger off back to London if you like. You know you want to anyway.' It was true. She'd never felt comfortable here. She'd come when Mum got ill, and stayed to look after me, but she was like a fish out of water. The sea air made her cough. The big bright sky made her screw up her eyes and she'd scuttle back inside like a cockroach as fast as she could.

'Less of your language,' she said, 'and pack a bag.'

'You can't tell me what to do. You're not my mum. I'm not packing,' I said, and I didn't.

Now we have five minutes to get ready. Nan stirs herself and starts putting more things into her bin bag. She disappears into her room and comes out with an armful of clothes and a polished wooden box tucked under her arm. She moves around the flat surprisingly fast. I feel a tide of panic rising inside me. I can't leave here. I'm not ready. It's not fair.

I get one of the chairs from the kitchen and lean it up against the door handle. But it's not the right height to wedge the handle shut, so I just start grabbing whatever I can find and building a barricade. I push the sofa over, pile the kitchen chair on top, then the coffee table. I'm breathing hard, sweating between my shoulder blades.

'Adam, what the hell are you doing?'

Nan's tearing at my arm, trying to stop me. Her long yellow fingernails are digging in. I shrug her off.

'Get off, Nan. I'm not going!'

'Don't be stupid. Get some of your things. You'll want your things with you.'

I take no notice.

'Adam, don't be so fucking stupid!' She's clawing at me again, and then someone's knocking on the door.

'Open up!'

I freeze, and look at Nan. Her eyes show me her number: 2022054. She's got another thirty years, near enough, but you'd never guess it. She looks like she could go any day.

'Open up!'

'Adam, please . . .'

'No, Nan.'

'Stand away from the door! Stand back!'

street below. They'd warned everyone that the sea wall was likely to go. It was built years ago before the sea level rose, and it wasn't going to stand another storm with a spring tide to add to the swell.

We thought the water would come and then go, but it came and it stayed.

'S'pose this is what Venice looked like before it was washed away,' Nan said, gloomily. She flicked her cigarette butt out of the window and down into the water below. It bobbed slowly along the street towards where the prom had been. And she lit another fag.

The electricity was cut off that first night, then the water in the taps turned brown. People waded along the street outside shouting through loud hailers, warning us not to drink the water, saying they'd bring us food and water. They didn't. Instead we made do with what we'd got, but with no toaster and no microwave, and the milk going off in the fridge, we were starting to get hungry after twelve hours. I knew things were bad when Nan took the cellophane off her last packet of fags.

'Once these are gone we're going to have to get out of here, son,' she said.

'I'm not going,' I told her. This was my home. It was all I had left of Mum.

'We can't stay here, not like this.'

'I'm not going.' Statement of fact. 'You can bugger off back to London if you like. You know you want to anyway.' It was true. She'd never felt comfortable here. She'd come when Mum got ill, and stayed to look after me, but she was like a fish out of water. The sea air made her cough. The big bright sky made her screw up her eyes and she'd scuttle back inside like a cockroach as fast as she could.

'Less of your language,' she said, 'and pack a bag.'

'You can't tell me what to do. You're not my mum. I'm not packing,' I said, and I didn't.

Now we have five minutes to get ready. Nan stirs herself and starts putting more things into her bin bag. She disappears into her room and comes out with an armful of clothes and a polished wooden box tucked under her arm. She moves around the flat surprisingly fast. I feel a tide of panic rising inside me. I can't leave here. I'm not ready. It's not fair.

I get one of the chairs from the kitchen and lean it up against the door handle. But it's not the right height to wedge the handle shut, so I just start grabbing whatever I can find and building a barricade. I push the sofa over, pile the kitchen chair on top, then the coffee table. I'm breathing hard, sweating between my shoulder blades.

'Adam, what the hell are you doing?'

Nan's tearing at my arm, trying to stop me. Her long yellow fingernails are digging in. I shrug her off.

'Get off, Nan. I'm not going!'

'Don't be stupid. Get some of your things. You'll want your things with you.'

I take no notice.

'Adam, don't be so fucking stupid!' She's clawing at me again, and then someone's knocking on the door.

'Open up!'

I freeze, and look at Nan. Her eyes show me her number: 2022054. She's got another thirty years, near enough, but you'd never guess it. She looks like she could go any day.

'Open up!'

'Adam, please . . .'

'No, Nan.'

'Stand away from the door! Stand back!'

‘Adam—’

A sledgehammer smashes the lock. Then the door itself is shredded. In the corridor there’s two soldiers, one with the sledgehammer, the other with a gun. It’s pointing straight into the flat. It’s pointing at us. The soldiers quickly scan the rest of the flat.

‘All right, ma’am,’ says the gunman. ‘I’ll have to ask you to move that obstruction and leave the building.’

Nan nods.

‘Adam,’ she says, ‘move the sofa.’

I’m staring at the end of the rifle. I can’t take my eyes off it. In the next second, maybe less than that, it could all be over. This could be it. All I have to do is make a move towards him. If it’s my time, my day to go, that’ll be it. What is my number? Is it today?

The barrel of the rifle is clean and smooth and straight. Will I see the bullet come out? Will there be smoke?

‘Fuck off,’ I say. ‘Take your fucking gun and fuck off.’

And then it all happens at once. The sledgehammer guy drops his hammer and shoves the sofa into the room like a rugby player in a scrum, the guy with the gun tilts it up to the ceiling and follows him in and Nan smacks me, right across my face.

‘Listen, you little bastard,’ she hisses at me, ‘I promised your mum I’d look after you, and I will. I’m your nan and you’ll do what I say. Now stop playing silly buggers. We’re leaving. And mind your fucking language, I told you about that.’

My face is stinging but I’m not ready to give in yet. This is my home. They can’t just take you away from your home, can they?

They can.

The soldiers grab an arm each and carry me out of the flat. I struggle, but they’re big and there’s two of them. It’s all so quick. Before I know it, I’m at the end of the corridor and down the fire escape and they’ve put me in an inflatable boat at the bottom of the steps. Nan gets in beside me, dumps the bulging bin bag by her feet and puts her arm round my shoulders, and we’re away, chugging slowly through the flooded streets.

‘It’s all right, Adam,’ she says, ‘it’s going to be all right.’

Some of the people on our boat are crying quietly. But most of their faces are blank. I’m still angry and humiliated. I can’t understand what just happened.

I haven’t got any of my stuff. I haven’t got my book. Another wave of panic sweeps over me. I’ll have to get out and go back. I can’t go without my book. Where did I leave it? When did I last have it? Then I feel the edge of something hard against my hip and my hand goes down to my pocket. Of course, it’s there. I haven’t put it anywhere – I’ve kept it with me, like I always do.

I relax, just a little bit. And then it hits me. We’re actually leaving. We’re going. I might never see the flat again.

There’s a big lump in my throat. I try to swallow it, but it won’t go. I can feel the tears welling up. The soldier steering the boat is watching me. I’m not going to cry, not in front of him or Nan or any of these people. I won’t give them the satisfaction. I dig my fingernails into the back of my hand. The tears are still there, threatening to spill out. I dig harder, so the pain breaks through everything else. I’m not going to cry. I’m not going to. I won’t.

At the transit centre, we stand in line to register. There’s one queue for people who have somewhere to go, and another one for people who haven’t. Nan and I aren’t chipped, so we have to show our ID cards and Nan fills in forms for both of us requesting transport to London. They pin a piece of paper with a number onto our coats, like we're about to run a marathon, then they herd us into a hall and tell us to wait.

People are giving out hot food and drinks. We queue up again. My mouth waters when we get nearer the front and I can see and smell the food. We're four from the front when another soldier comes into the hall and starts barking out numbers, including ours. Our coach is ready. We have to leave now.

'Nan . . . ?' I'm so hungry. I can't go without getting something to eat, just something.

'Scuse me,' I say, 'can you let me through?'

There's no reaction. Everyone's pretending they haven't heard.

I try again, as the soldier repeats the numbers. Nothing. I'm desperate. I dart forward and shove my hand through a gap between two people, and feel around blindly. My fingers find something – it feels like a piece of toast – and I pick it up. Someone grabs my wrist and holds on so tightly it hurts.

'There's a queue,' he says firmly. 'We're British. We know how to queue.'

'I'm sorry,' I say. 'It's for my nan. She's hungry and we've got to go now.'

I look up into the face of the man holding me. He's middle aged, about fifty. Grey hair and a grim face, you can see how tired he is, but that's not what shocks me – it's his number. 112027. Only six months to live. I get a flash of his death, too, and it's brutal, violent, a blow to the head, blood, brains . . .

I drop the toast back onto the plate and try to back away.

The man lets go of my wrist, he thinks he's won, but he must have seen something in me, too, because his face softens and he reaches across, picks up the toast and hands it to me.

'For your nan,' he says. 'Go on, son. Don't miss your coach.'

'Thanks,' I murmur.

I think about cramming the whole lot in there and then, but the man's watching me and so is Nan, so I carry the toast carefully outside, and when Nan and I are settled on the coach, I give it to her. She tears it in two and gives half back. We don't speak. I stuff mine in my mouth and it's gone in two bites, but Nan savours hers, making it last 'til we're out of town and heading east along the main road. The road's on a raised-up strip of land with miles and miles of flooded fields all round it. The sun's come out at last and it's turned the water into a sheet of silver so bright you can't look at it.

'Nan,' I say. 'What if the whole world floods? What will we do then?'

She wipes a smudge of butter off her chin with her finger, and licks it.

'We'll build an ark, shall we, you and me? And invite all the animals?' She chuckles and picks up my hand with the one she's just licked. There are deep red crescents on my skin where I dug my nails in on the boat.

'What you done there?' she asks.

'Nothing.'

She looks at me and frowns. Then she gives my hand a little squeeze.

'Don't worry, son. We'll be all right in London. There's flood defences there, and everything. They know how to do things properly there. We'll be fine. Good old London Town.'

She puts her head back, closes her eyes and sighs, happy

6
7
4
4
20
24
7
4
6
4
24
2067
7
5
24
32 1

to be heading home at last. But I can't relax. I have to write down the man in the queue's number before I forget it. It's shaken me up. You get a feeling for people's numbers, when you've seen them all your life. And his number didn't seem to match him. I'm feeling edgy. I'll be better once I write it down.

I get my book out of my pocket, and record all the details I can remember: description (it's better when I know the names), today's date, the place, his number, how he's going to die. I write it carefully, and every letter, every word makes me calmer. It's all in there now, safe in my book. I can look at it later.

I put my notebook back. Nan's starting to snore gently. She's well away. I look at the other passengers. Some of them are trying to sleep, but some are like me – anxious and watchful. From where I'm sitting I can see six or seven people who are still awake. We catch each other's eyes and then we look away again, without saying anything, like strangers do.

But just one moment of eye contact is all I need to see their numbers, a different number for each one – the different dates that mark the end of their lives.

Except these numbers aren't that different. Five of them end in 12027 and two are exactly the same: 112027.

My heart's pounding in my chest now, my breathing's gone shallow and fast. I reach into my pocket 'til my fingers find my notebook again. My hands are shaking, but I manage to get the book out and open it at the right page.

These people are like the man in the food queue – they've only got six months left.

They're going to die in January next year.

They're going to die in London.

September 2026

Sarah

You know why you're here. It's not what you're used to, but we're running out of options. They won't tolerate you playing up here – being late, or truanting, or answering back. This is a chance for you to start again, do it right this time, knuckle down. Please, Sarah, don't let us down. Don't let yourself down.'

Blah, blah, blah. Same old same old. I let it drift over me, too tired to listen. I hardly slept last night, and when I did I had the nightmare again and I had to wake myself up. I lay awake then, listening to the noises a house makes at night, until it got light.

I don't say anything back to Him, not even 'goodbye' as I get out of the Merc. I slam the car door and in my head I can see Him wince, hear Him curse me, and it makes me feel better, just for a second.

The Merc has turned people's heads, like it always does. It's not every day you see a car on the school run, never mind a gas-guzzler like Dad's. Now people are checking me out.

6
7 Great, I'll be marked out as different before I even start. Still, what do I care?

Someone whistles and purrs, 'Niiiiice,' long and low at me.

4 A group of lads have stopped to stare, six or seven of them. They're looking me up and down, licking their lips like wolves. What am I meant to feel? Intimidated? Flattered? Screw that. I show them the finger and walk in through the gates.

20 It's not bad for a state school, I suppose. At least it's all new, not scruffy like I've been expecting. But it's only new because the previous one was burnt out in the 2022 riots and it's still got a bit of a reputation, Forest Green: tough regime, tough kids. My heart sank when Mum and Dad said they'd enrolled me, but then I thought, What the hell. One school's the same as any other. School, home – they're all prisons, aren't they? All there to make you conform. It doesn't matter where I am – my mind's my own, they can't control that.

4 And wherever they send me, I don't plan to stay for long. I've got other things on my mind, well, one big thing, or at least a small thing that's getting bigger. And it means that I have to start thinking for myself, planning, taking control.

24
2067 I have to get my life back.

I can't wait much longer.

I have to get away.

Adam

I didn't start it. It wasn't me.

Nan told me not to get into trouble when I was setting off in the morning, and I wasn't going to. I was just going to turn up, register, do what I had to do and get back to Nan's.

I know there'll be a lot of twenty-sevens there, because there are a lot of twenty-sevens everywhere. All summer, I've been clocking them. The entries in my book show the same picture wherever I've been.

'Kilburn High Road. 84.'

'The offie, sherry for Nan. 12.'

There are so many I don't write down their details any more. I can't. I only record how many I've seen that time. I still keep proper records on people who are different, or if I know their names. And it makes me feel better, well, a bit better. At least it used to. But the longer I stay in London, the more I know we've made a mistake. We should never have come here. It's dangerous. A lot of people are going to die.